

Abyssal Ritual Keeper

A massive octopus clutches a heavy stone basin shaped like an ancient ritual wash altar once used by sea witches. The structure is carved with faded symbols and worn by centuries of salt and coral growth. Whether the creature guards it intentionally or has simply claimed it as its domain is unknown, but divers swear the water around it sometimes glows faintly during the darkest tides.

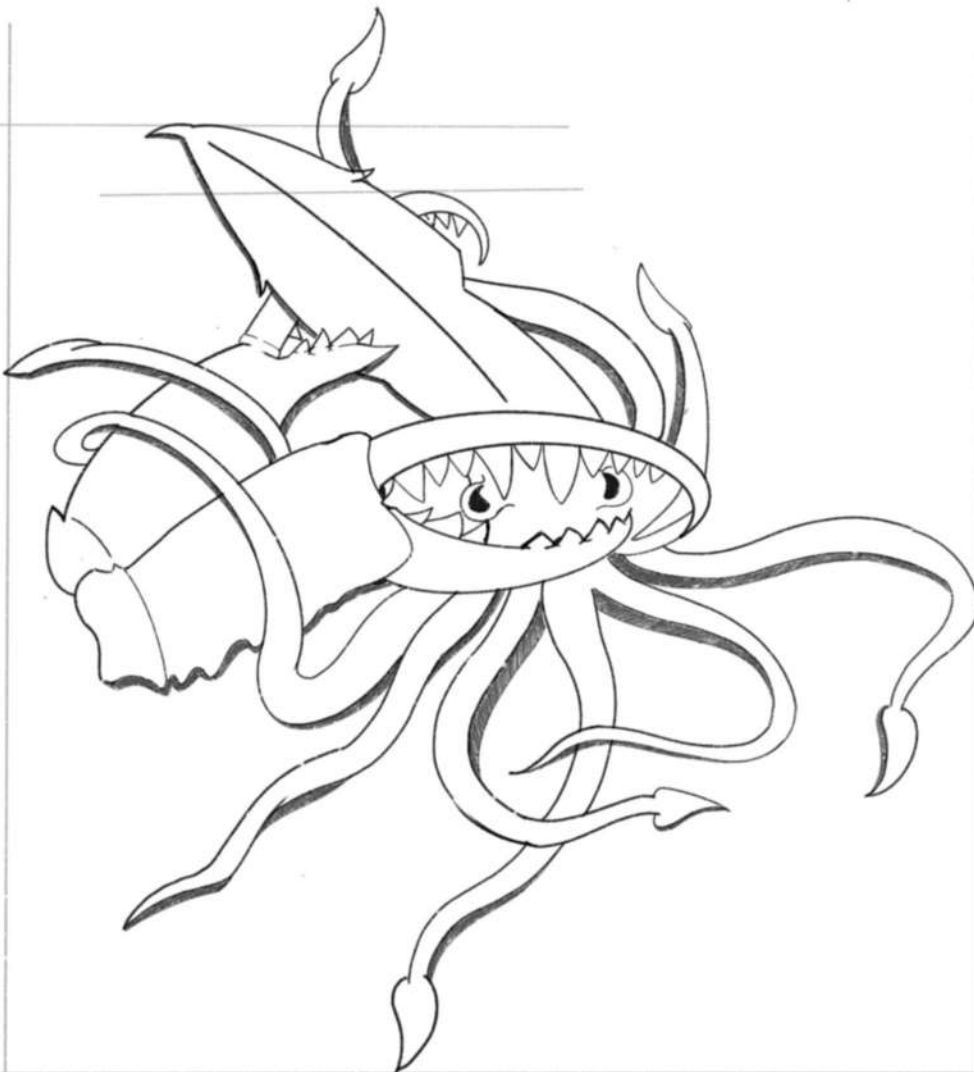

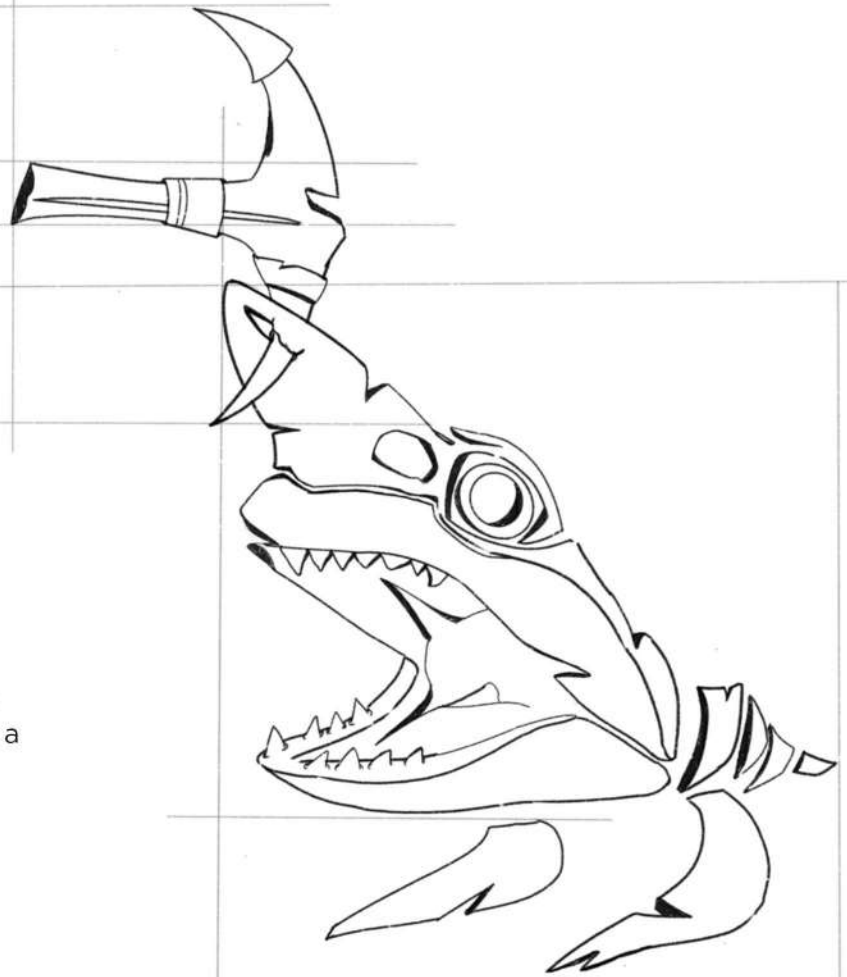

The Lost Message Bottle

A broken glass bottle drifts slowly with the current, its jagged edges softened by the sea. Inside, a small parchment scroll remains carefully tied and protected from the water. A tiny squid clings to the glass as if guarding the secret within. No one knows who wrote the message, but rumors say it carries coordinates, a warning, or the last words of a lost sailor.

Anchorbound Relic

The skeletal remains of a once-powerful shark lie half-buried in the seabed. An enormous rusted anchor is driven straight through its nasal bone, locking the skeleton in place like a grim monument. Whether it was struck during a violent struggle with a ship or simply drifted into the anchor long ago remains a mystery. Now it stands as a silent reminder of the ocean's unforgiving history.

Crab's Prison

Caught in the crushing grip of enormous crab claws, a giant squid hangs suspended in an endless struggle that likely ended long ago. The crab's grip is so powerful that escape was impossible. What remains is a frozen display of the deep sea's brutal food chain—where even the strongest predators can become prey.

Living Shock Eel

This aggressive eel can coil around a diver's arm like a living weapon. When stimulated, it releases powerful electrical bursts that travel through the surrounding water in crackling waves. Skilled hunters have learned to harness the creature's natural defense as a tool, turning it into an organic shock cannon capable of stunning enemies and machinery alike.

